

There is much of great interest in this book, although it is doubtful whether a work of 500 pages with a bibliography of 432 references can, without meiosis, be described as a synopsis. To the initiated there is little new, but it is unlikely to make many converts. The several authors have achieved a standard aridity of style and a polysyllabic uniformity which will support the vulgar suspicion that psychiatrists are unable to express themselves in comprehensible language: this is unfortunate, because the book contains much wisdom. Prolegomena, as a heading for the final paragraph of the book, illustrates the author's unexpected use of words.

TECHNIQUE OF OFFICER SELECTION

The Group Approach to Leadership-Testing. By Henry Harris, M.D. With foreword by General Sir Ronald Adam, Bart., G.C.B., D.S.O., and preface by Brigadier A. Torrie. (Pp. 288. £1 1s.) London: Routledge and Kegan Paul.

This is the first comprehensive account of the methods used for the selection of Army officers in the recent war. It is written by an enthusiast and lacks the detachment and precision which we may expect from the official volume which is in preparation. It does, however, convey something of the spirit which animated the teams of psychiatrists, psychologists, and combatant officers who formed the War Office Selection Boards.

If it is borne in mind that the book represents the views elaborated by a combination of technical and non-technical persons some of its peculiar features will be better understood. The author revels in a jargon which will annoy all but the most good-humoured of readers. While there may be good reasons for having to accept words like Benelux and Unesco, it is difficult to forgive the use of imag for "immature aggressive personality" and lots for the "law of the total situation." These are ephemeral terms not likely to gain currency outside their immediate context, and they do not merit the somewhat pompous significance which they are given by the use of this nomenclature.

This is an extremely individual account which describes officer selection as one observer saw it, and which he has expressed in his own idiom. For instance, when Dr. Harris borrows his analogies from judo it should not be assumed that he is expressing a system of ideas which was prevalent in War Office Selection Boards. Readers who have an interest in selection will, however, gain a great deal from this lively description by one who was undoubtedly extremely skilful in its practice and who has taken considerable pains to give a very detailed account of the methods used by him and his immediate colleagues.

VASCULAR DISEASE FROM THE SURGICAL STANDPOINT

Surgical Management of Vascular Diseases. By Gerald H. Pratt, M.D., F.A.C.S. (Pp. 496; 181 illustrations. £3 10s.) London: Henry Kimpton. 1949.

The author's aim is to present a practical guide to his subject, founded on his long experience of vascular disease. The sections on the arterial and venous systems are full and contain much useful advice, though some of the conclusions will not be universally accepted. Fuller follow-up information is needed on such procedures as Babcock's operation for aortic aneurysm, and to recommend morphine $\frac{1}{2}$ gr. (32 mg.) hourly without some word of caution is dangerous, particularly in a book recommended for students. More support for diagnosis is sometimes required if the procedures advocated are to be carried out. A notable omission is venography; erythrocytosis frigida and the use of protamine in heparin therapy are also excluded.

Arterial hypertension is discussed usefully in a short chapter, but the surgery of the heart is described less fully (though this section would be useful to students). There are chapters on such varied topics as skin grafting, radioactive isotopes, and the compensation aspects of vascular disease.

The rather careless style sometimes makes the sense difficult to follow, and this fault is not helped by a surprising number of printing errors. Mention of Percivall Pott as "Perc Pott" cannot be passed over, and W. J. Potts is referred to as Pott, which adds to the confusion. The commoner operations are described in some detail. Although primarily concerned with surgical treatment, the pathology and symptoms of many conditions are presented in varying detail. The reader will find the book useful provided that he remembers, as the preface points out, that many of the views expressed are the author's own.

CEDRIC J. LONGLAND

Practical Biochemistry for Medical Students, by G. T. Mills, B.Sc., Ph.D. (foreword by J. N. Davidson, M.D., D.Sc.; pp. 244; illustrated; 15s.; Glasgow: John Smith and Son), is designed to provide a collection of experiments that illustrate the general properties of the biological materials the medical student will meet with and to familiarize him with the analytical procedures applied to such materials. The methods described are simple, the tests are familiar, well established, and well described, and theoretical explanations are reduced to a minimum. The four plates include one in colour of the absorption spectra of haemoglobin derivatives; this does not, however, indicate the wavelengths of the various bands shown. The text is printed on one side only of the page, which has advantages but may tempt the hasty worker to forgo the use of a rough note-book.
