

military or religious despotism, and are educated from infants in implicit submission and non-resistance; in Britain everyone thinks and acts as he pleases. . . . The agitations of passions, this liberty of thinking and acting with less restraint than in other nations, force a great quantity of blood to the head, and produce greater varieties of madness in this country, than is observed in others."

Pinel asked himself if it was

"from a peculiar national pride, and to display their superiority over other nations, that the English boast of their ability in curing madness by moral remedies; and at the same time conceal the cunning of this art with an impenetrable veil? . . . After fifteen years' diligent enquiry . . . I have never been able to discover any development of this English secret for the treatment of insanity, though all concur in the ability of their management."

These quotations are taken from Dr. Denis Leigh's Historical Development of British Psychiatry, the first volume of which, dealing with the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, has just been published. Were Pinel alive to-day he would doubtless look for an answer to his query in its pages, but the secret remains a secret, for this book is a straightforward account of the lives and published work of certain British psychiatrists rather than a comprehensive study of all the factors which affected the development of British psychiatry. Nevertheless Dr. Leigh has brought together a great deal of valuable material, giving us biographical detail as well as generous excerpts from the books which he has collected and studied and extensive bibliographies for further reading. Two-thirds of the book are given to accounts of John Haslam (1764-1844), the "Mad Doctor" who was apothecary to Bethlem from 1795 to 1816, James Cowles Prichard (1786-1848)—better remembered as anthropologist than psychiatrist—and John Conolly (1794-1866), whose name is associated with the introduction of the system of non-restraint in the asylum at Hanwell.

We must be grateful for this first attempt to provide a historical guide to the development of this specialty in Britain, but much still remains to be written on this subject. From the wealth of literary and historical material—outside the purely professional literature of psychiatry—must be drawn the larger scene in which Dr. Leigh's heroes played their part. The work has over fifty illustrations, many of them portraits and some of objects in the author's collection. The proof-readers have overlooked some errors, such as "Galenickal" (p. 20) and "calumnated" (p. 72).

Current Immigration Figures

Mr. D. RENTON, Minister of State at the Home Office, presented the figures for Commonwealth immigration during March and April in reply to questions on May 24, and the totals for the first four months of this year. These show a net inward movement during January to April, 1962, of 52,990, compared with 31,840 in 1961 and 9,360 in 1960. The March influx this year was 16,920 (compared with 10,320 and 2,510 in the two previous years), and the April figure 15,320 (compared with 12,590 and 5,160). The largest arrivals were from the West Indies—17,900 this year (compared with 18,550 and 9,800); India—10,450 (4,960 and 960); Pakistan—16,480 (4,810 and minus 380).

Rabies

Sir RICHARD GLYN (Dorset, North, Con.) asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries, and Food on May 25 when the present system of quarantine for dogs against rabies was instituted; when the last dog developed rabies in quarantine kennels; and how many animals had been infected with rabies in Great Britain inside and outside quarantine kennels, respectively, since the quarantine system was instituted. Mr. W. F. M. VANE, the Joint Parliamentary Secretary, said that control of imported dogs began in 1897 with an Order imposing a period of 90 days' quarantine at the owner's house. In 1901 a fresh Order imposed a period of six months' quarantine in premises under the control of a veterinary surgeon. This had been reduced to four months in 1914, was extended again to six months in 1918, and had remained so since. The last case of rabies in quarantine kennels occurred in 1949.

Cases of rabies in dogs had occurred in quarantine kennels as follows: 1915 (1), 1919 (2), 1924 (3), 1927 (1), 1928 (1), 1929 (1), 1930 (1), 1937 (2), 1938 (1), 1939 (2), 1946 (1), 1947 (3), 1948 (3), and 1949 (2). Cases of rabies in dogs had occurred outside quarantine kennels as follows: 1897 (151), 1898 (17), 1899 (9), 1900 (6), 1901 (1), 1902 (13), 1918 (98), 1919 (150), 1920 (41), 1921 (22), and 1922 (1).

Gamma Globulin for German Measles

Sir ANTHONY HURD (Newbury, Con.) asked on May 21 what steps the Ministry of Health was taking to increase the supply of gamma globulin for use during early pregnancy as a precaution against German measles with the risk of congenital abnormalities, so that the full dose might be generally available on medical advice. Miss EDITH PITT, Parliamentary Secretary, replied that the Minister had asked the Medical Research Council to assess the national requirement of gamma globulin for protection against rubella and other purposes. Meanwhile supplies were being imported.

Scottish Mental Health Act

Mr. HECTOR HUGHES (Aberdeen, North, Lab.) asked the Secretary of State for Scotland on May 23 for a statement on the working of the Mental Health (Scotland) Act, indicating which stages had been brought into operation. Mr. J. S. MACLAY stated that since the beginning of 1961, patients had been able to enter mental hospitals in the same informal way as other hospitals. Since May, 1961, local health authorities had been under an obligation to make proposals for discharging the functions allotted to them. The rest of the Act, incorporating the new code for patients subject to statutory detention or guardianship, would come into operation on June 1.
