medicine, and it offers a feasible blue-print for a nation-wide occupational health service. It is no small feat to do this so thoroughly in 103 pages.

Book titles are not always accurately descriptive, but Dr. Luffingham really has taken a new look at the subject under the spotlight of operational analysis. He is not concerned with details of hazards, first-aid training, and the like, but, to quote his chapter headings, with "What Industrial Medicine is About"; "What Went Wrong?"; "A Look at the Future"; "What Can be Done Now?"; and "A New Look at Industrial Medicine." So far as I know the ground has not been explored in any parallel way before.

In the preliminary examination of the field the author produces some concepts which, as he says, may surprise many doctors practising industrial medicine. But they are convincing, and given careful consideration should gain more acceptance than rejection. He holds that misunderstanding of the proper role of industrial medicine has been a big factor in the conflict between doctor and politician, which has lasted too long. The analysis of how achievement in the National Health Service diverged from intention is concise and illuminating. Here again some points carry an impact of surprise. Medicine's two roles of preventing and curing disease have long presented a dilemma to those responsible for its organization and administration in that prevention is more profitable in the long term and therapy more clamant in its urgency. Dr. Luffingham shows that as far more diseases are now preventable than ever before, there is greater need to resolve the dilemma, and offers a solution through the expansion and amplification of occupational medicine. The details, of course, cannot be indicated here except to say that his "Area Council" structure deserves special study and attention.

Knowing that, while one must plan, "planners" present hazards, the author very properly writes: "A nation-wide Occupational Health Service must be encouraged to grow from below upwards, and administration must be at its best and strongest at local level." There are many such memorable remarks, and space must be found for one more: "The art of administration is that of obtaining the best results from the work of others."

This "New Look" will interest, and possibly provoke, doctors, administrators, and industrialists, and we should hope also parliamentarians, newspaper editors, and broadcasters, for it deserves the widest discussion. The issues are vital, and the proposed solution appears practical, though it will not be implemented without controversy. But that is how it should be in a democracy.

WALTER P. KENNEDY.
