

PARLIAMENT

Health Services Bill: committee stage starts

The Standing Committee on the Health Services Bill began last week, sitting on 18 and 20 May. The Secretary of State for Social Services, Mr David Ennals, told the committee "The . . . Bill . . . follows lengthy discussions with the medical and dental professions, and embodies the carefully balanced compromise which was reached with them on 15 December, and which came to be known as the 'Goodman proposals.'" The Government intended, he said, to uphold the spirit of the proposals and the balance which was achieved in December. He reiterated that he would not be unbending in considering amendments designed to clarify the proposals. "By this," he added, "I mean amendments consistent with the principles of the Government's undertaking, which aims at separating private practice from NHS hospitals in an orderly and reasonable manner and preserving the right of private practice outside NHS hospitals."

On the Health Services Board Mr Ennals told the committee that it would be "independent of Government and Secretary of State, and that its membership shall be carefully balanced to reflect the different interests and the sharply opposing points of views." The Secretary of State proposed that the consideration of the schedule of beds to be phased out should be left to the conclusion of the committee's proceedings so that further consultation could take place and agreement reached on the 1000 beds to be withdrawn. On 20 May representatives of the BMA discussed aspects of the Bill with Mr Ennals; he told the committee "I shall not be re-opening negotiations on the substance of the Bill but will attempt to reach some measure of agreement within the overall framework of the Bill."

Aims of the Opposition

In a statement on the day before the committee started, the Opposition spokesman on social services, Mr Patrick Jenkin, said that the Conservatives' three main objectives would be (1) to expose the hollowness of the Government's case for separating independent practice from the NHS, and to establish positively the case for expanding and integrating independent medicine within the framework of the NHS; (2) to seek proper protection for the patient, both NHS and private, who seemed to have been left out of the argument altogether; and (3) if they cannot force the Government to withdraw the Bill, at least to amend it drastically to meet the legitimate arguments of the professions affected.

MEDICAL NEWS

Health risks from asbestos

The Government announced in March (10 April, p 911) that the Health and Safety Commission had decided to set up an advisory committee to review the risks to health arising from exposure to asbestos and to make recommendations whether any further protection was required. The membership of the committee was announced on 18 May. Three members were nominated by the CBI and three by the TUC. There are four members of the medical profession who specialise in epidemiology, lung diseases, and occupational medicine; two occupational hygienists; a consultant chemical engineer and physicist; an environmental health officer; and a representative of the national consumer council. The chairman will be Mr W Simpson, chairman of the Health and Safety Commission, and it will be left to the committee to decide whether any of its proceedings will be held in public.

Research Funds Guide

The third edition of the BMA's Research Funds Guide is now available. The Board of Science and Education has updated the guide (first published in 1968), which is helpful to doctors engaged on research who are hampered by lack of knowledge about possible sources of finance. The guide lists most organisations prepared to consider applications from doctors for grants for research projects and gives helpful hints on the best methods of applying for a grant. The guide is available from the Publications Department at the BMA, BMA House, Tavistock Square, London WC1H 9JR. Price £1 including postage.
