

agree that the medical man must know men as well as books, or his book learning may never be applied, and that to know men one must mix with them; also that eternal association with men of one's own line of study, and with no others, the eternal presence of "shop," is wearying and antagonistic to true education.

This was the opinion of an Edinburgh teacher, Professor Patrick Geddes, expressed in the organisation of University Hall, a residence for students and others connected with the University. Seven years ago this started with seven rooms and four residents. It prospered until all the seven flats of the building were used. It spread to other houses under the same rules and with the same object; and its latest extension, formally opened by Professor Blackie last April, is now one of the most conspicuous features of the old town as seen from Princes Street.

Each house is self-governed through a committee consisting of a rent treasurer acting for Professor Geddes, and a house treasurer and secretary, with assistants, elected by the residents, holding office for a month, eligible for re-election, liable in their official capacity to criticism from any resident at the fortnightly house meetings. The names of intending residents, with their two references, are submitted to and voted upon by the residents, who have also the power of expelling any unruly member.

The rents of single rooms (with the use of common rooms) vary from 7s. 6d. to 16s. a week. The board bill in one house through last summer session averaged 11s. 9d., being merely the weekly bills equally divided among the residents.

University Hall is open to students and graduates of all Faculties, and in this way we believe that our interests are usefully widened, our experience increased, and that the younger students profit by the experience (always at their service) of their seniors, whether students or graduates.

The secretaries of any one of the houses of University Hall will, I know, be ready to answer any question put by those wishing further information.—I am, etc.,
