

own case; that the matter would obviously not stand reasoning, for undoubtedly a prisoner was entitled to bring forward medical evidence to rebut that of the prosecution, and it was essential for the defence that they should have all the material necessary to present their case. The reply was that Crown counsel saw no reason in this particular case for consenting to the presence of two additional medical men. It was added that an inquiry was then being made as to the expediency of any modification of the practice in this matter.

It is now four years since this inquiry was set on foot, but no change in the procedure has yet been made. Nor does it appear likely that any change will be made unless public interest is more thoroughly aroused.

The Lord Advocate, in reply to the question by Sir William Priestley of May 16th, practically repeated his previous statements. He said:

No person except the medical men instructed to conduct the necropsy is allowed to be present at a post-mortem examination except with the consent of Crown counsel or on the order of the sheriff. Crown counsel may, in their discretion, sanction the presence of a medical man who has attended the case or in the interests of the accused, but this is done only on condition that he is to be present merely as an onlooker, and is not to interfere in any way with the Crown examination. No formal intimation is given that a necropsy is to be held, but in all cases where any person is in custody on suspicion of causing death a necropsy is made as a matter of course, so that an accused person or his advisers cannot be in doubt as to the necessity of making immediate application for permission to send a medical man to witness the necropsy if they so desire it. The quarter to which application should be made is the Procurator-Fiscal, whose duty it is in all cases of urgency to communicate by telegraph with the Crown Agent for the instructions of Crown counsel. If an independent post-mortem examination is desired, it can be made after the Crown examination.

The Faculty of Physicians and Surgeons, in its letter to the Lord Advocate of April 2nd, 1895, showed that:

What is wanted to remedy this grievance appears to be an instruction from the Crown Office to Procurators-Fiscal that in every case in which a post-mortem examination is made by judicial or other warrant, they shall as a matter of routine give timely notice to any person who, in the light of the ascertained facts or the probabilities up to that time, may in their judgment be indicated as a person interested, that an examination at which he may if thought proper on application be represented by a medical man, shall be made at a time and place specified in the notice.

A QUESTION OF FEES.

A CORRESPONDENT who had advised one of his patients to go in a public hospital for an operation, was requested by the patient to be present at the time the operation was performed, and to visit her afterwards at the hospital. On sending in his account for these services it was repudiated, on the ground that it was unlawful for the doctor to charge for any attendance on the patient while she was in the hospital.

* * We have referred our correspondent's to an authority on Scots law, who replies: "The patient employed her medical man to do a specific service, namely, to call and make sure that she was being properly treated. She cannot expect that he was to do this for nothing.....I should advise that he has a good claim in law to payment for the services he did undoubtedly render in his patient's employment, whether these services involved full professional responsibility or not. The last consideration might have some influence on the amount of the fees that could be claimed, but I do not see what defence the patient might have to a claim for some remuneration. A doctor lives by his time, and in law employment always infers remuneration, as donation either of money or time is never presumed."

ADMINISTERING ANÆSTHETICS TO PATIENTS OF UNQUALIFIED DENTIST.

JUVENAL inquires if it is illegal for a registered medical practitioner to administer gas to patients of an unqualified dentist, and, if so, under what section of the Medical Act the provision is made?

* * The Medical Acts do not in express terms prohibit a registered medical practitioner administering gas to the patients of an unqualified dentist. If, however, any such practice were brought before the General Medical Council an inquiry would, we think, be held under the provisions of Section XXIX of the Medical Act, 1858, and the result to the medical practitioner might be serious.

UNIVERSITY OF ST. ANDREWS.

At a meeting of the University Court held on Saturday, September 16th, Mr. James Stuart, M.P., Rector of the University, in the chair, the Committee appointed to consider the necessary steps to be taken with regard to the erection of an adequate and suitably-equipped building for the Conjoint University School of Medicine at Dundee presented a report that they had examined plans of various sites, and had arrived at the decision that the site known as the "Church Site," situated at the back of the College, would be the most suitable. Consideration of the report was deferred pending inquiries as to the value of the site and as to the proportion of the expenditure involved in the proposed plan for the accommodation of the departments of anatomy and physiology. The following motion was agreed to: "That the University Court resolve that a qualifying course of practical materia medica shall be given at St. Andrews, under the supervision of Professor Marshall, for five years as from October, 1898." It was further resolved: "That the qualifying course in practical materia medica for the present year be carried on in the summer, and that the class be conducted by the assistant, under the supervision, as agreed, of Professor Marshall." It was unanimously resolved: "That the Court recall the appointment of the Berry and Finance Committees, and remit the whole question of the income and expenditure of the University to the Business and Finance Committee, with recommendations to bring up a report as soon as possible, and with instructions to consult the Senate as to such of the resolutions arrived at as they deem fit, in order that the whole question may be considered at the Court meeting in January." On consideration of a minute of the subcommittee on the superintendence of the Museum, and a statement by Professor Mackintosh thereupon, the meeting voted a sum of £40 per annum towards the salary of a curator.
