

articles are academic in nature, though many of the compounds referred to are of industrial importance, and are replete with the particular form of ideograph peculiar to the organic chemist at his most truculent. The spell is broken by a more general article on pyrotechny, suitable for young chemists of all ages. Articles on radioactivity and radium reflect the expansion of interest in these subjects, as does that on the separation of rare earths.

The value and importance of rubber are shown by the 86 pages on this subject, in which sources, processing, and vulcanization are discussed, as well as chemical constitutions of the material in its raw and processed forms. The same article includes an account of the various forms of synthetic rubber and compares and contrasts the source materials and methods of manufacture. Silicones, silver, smoke, and soap, including synthetic detergents, form an industrial crescendo reaching fortissimo at sodium, with which the volume ends.

In addition to the major articles, many of which have been mentioned as an indication of the contents of this volume, there are a large number of smaller monographs on less important topics and items included solely for cross reference to other articles in order that the information given on them should not be missed.

CHILDBIRTH AND MOTHERHOOD

Introduction to Motherhood. By Grantly Dick Read, M.A., M.D. (Pp. 92; illustrations. 6s.) London: William Heinemann Medical Books. 1950.

When in the early 'thirties Dr. Grantly Dick Read introduced his method of "natural childbirth" the medical public was sceptical if not hostile. On the other hand, many women were quick to appreciate that he had what for them was a new message; this is not the first example of the laity leading the medical profession. The demand for physiological childbirth, at first a ripple, is now a tidal wave. Those who still refuse to heed it should seriously ask themselves whether they are not failing in their service to the community.

As with other ideas that have originated in this country it has needed American organization and enthusiasm to put them over and convince the world of their practical advantages. The "Read" system for the conduct of pregnancy and labour has been in operation in certain obstetric centres in the U.S.A.—notably that associated with Yale University and the name of Dr. Herbert Thoms. Reports have been published to show that antenatal preparation (more important is the attitude of the attendants in the delivery room) can help to make childbirth an exhilarating experience.

In this small book, intended for those contemplating marriage and parenthood, the author explains in simple language what motherhood involves. As would be expected, he has described the emotional aspects of pregnancy and labour. There are four phases during the act of birth when the emotions may gain the upper hand and disrupt the harmony of the natural process. By being forewarned a woman will recognize these changes as milestones in the course of labour to be passed with a feeling of achievement. The exercises, simply and clearly illustrated, can be practised without any special instruction, and the labour position is one which should be more widely adopted in this country. No medical author has been so extensively read by laymen as Dr. Dick Read, and it is safe to predict that this latest book of his will be appreciated by a wide public.

The relative accuracy of the different methods is estimated, and the author points out that, using the same number of animals in both cases, a graded response toxicity assay is four times more sensitive than a quantal ("all-or-none") response.

Medical Notes in Parliament

Midwives without Certificates

On a motion for the continuance of certain Defence Regulations, debated on October 23, Captain Crookshank moved to omit Regulation 33.

Dr. CHARLES HILL said the persons covered by this regulation were women who, under Section 5 of the Midwives Act, 1936, had given up practice, or were required to give up practice with compensation. In general their experience was insufficient to enable them to justify their continuance as midwives. If Regulation 33 were continued, someone could be recognized as a midwife who had not practised midwifery for 11 years. He asked whether there was at present any justification for so diluting the midwifery service.

Mr. A. BLENKINSOP said the regulation applied only to those who had voluntarily surrendered their certificates. There was a steadily diminishing number of midwives to which this applied. In 1947 there had been 76, in 1948 65, and in 1949 61. Local authorities were anxious to retain the services of midwives who came back into midwifery work during and immediately after the war and were still urgently needed in those areas. There would be no point in making special provision for an amendment of the Midwives Act. The temporary provision would cease as the midwives concerned retired from service.

Captain Crookshank's amendment was negatived.

The Cost of Hospitals

During the debate on the address replying to the King's Speech, Mr. D. McA. ECCLES on November 2 referred to the rise in hospital costs. He said that in a London hospital with no more beds to-day than before the National Health Service the cost of maintenance had doubled. There must be some other cause for this increase than the cost of supplies and food-stuffs. The position was worse in the provinces, where the hospitals were not so well managed as the London teaching hospitals. He had looked the other day at the cost of the Royal Salopian Infirmary, Shrewsbury. Before the Act had come into operation that hospital had four or five members on its finance staff. A few months ago the governors were worried because they had 22 doing the same work for the same number of beds. They sent someone to look into this and were able to dispense with 12 of these 22. He understood that there was no difference in the efficiency of the work being done. That example could be multiplied throughout the administration of hospitals to-day. The Minister of Health had invented a monster which he was unable to control.
