

THE APPEARANCES ON OPENING THE BODY OF SIR THOMAS LYTTELTON.

16th Sept., 1751.

On opening the abdomen or lower belly we found all the parts perfectly sound.

In the breast or thorax the lungs appear'd of a livid colour, and through their whole substance were allmost fill'd wth small schirrous tubercles, interspers'd wth. purulent matter but quite free from any adhesion to the containing parts. In the left cavity we found more than a pint of a yellowish brown serous fluid. The great artery just above the heart & below it down to the bottom of the abdomen, was distended to an immense degree, & just at the heart this sac or cyst contain'd a large polypus, that weigh'd 2 ounces, of a hard, fleshy, and curdly substance. This cyst adher'd firmly to the vertebre of the spina, at the curvature of the aorta, or large artery. The spine was considerably distorted & bent to the right side at the place of this adhesion.

The bones of the cranium or skull were join'd together so close, that they appear'd as one continued bone.

The membranes of the brain, & the brain itself through its whole substance, appear'd perfectly sound.

The 2 lateral ventricles of the brain were very full of a clear limpid fluid.

We found the eye that he had most complain'd of perfectly sound and well.
