

a statement would be construed by any fair reasoner into a charge of venality against the legal profession; and although some medical men were actually employed by Madame Lafarge to disprove the fact of arsenical poisoning, attested by Orfila, I do not believe such a perversion of medical talent would be deemed a charge against the whole medical faculty of Paris. The effort to turn the force of my arguments into a "gratuitous charge of venality" is clumsy and unfair in the extreme. The tone and spirit of the article in question is in clear contradiction to such a distorted assumption. But "error," says Curran, "is in its nature flippant and compendious—it hops with airy and fastidious levity over proofs and arguments, and perches upon assertions which it calls conclusions."

I will, now, however, leave Mr. Poyser, having touched his perversions of my humble criticisms merely in self defence, hoping, with your permission, in a future paper to recur to the subject of the contagion of pestilential cholera—a doctrine not quite so extinct as your Wirksworth correspondent imagines.

I am, Sir,

Your obedient Servant,

EDWARD OKE SPOONER.

Blandford, Dec. 16, 1848.
