

was distinctly referred to the members generally of the Branch Association.

At the preliminary committee-meeting held on the day of general assembly, our medico-political condition was indeed broached by our highly respected secretary, Mr. Martin, of Reigate, but merely as a member of the Association, (though highly esteemed, and one worthy of the greatest deference.) He no doubt felt the necessity of grappling with this disagreeable, though not less urgent and important question, seizing the favourable occasion usually so difficult to obtain. And, as to the occupation of time at the general meeting, on the subject of Medical Reform, I think that any candid observer will admit, that if the animated discussions which followed a not very remarkable commencement, be received as a proof of the general interest taken in this important topic, then the remark that time was occupied "to an unprofitable end," will not apply here.

Further still, our political condition will ever hold the closest relation with our social state; so close, indeed, that it may be doubted if the latter could exist, except in the rudest state, without the necessary antecedence of those general principles of human kind, which lay the foundation of, and regulate, our social union. A profound writer has remarked that, "the provisions which nature has made for the intellectual and moral progress of the species, all suppose the existence of the political union. And the particular form which this union happens, in the case of any community, to assume, determines many of the most important circumstances in the character, . . . and many of those opinions and habits which affect the happiness of private life."

It follows from this, admitting its applicability, that the consideration of such an important subject could not but secure the closest attention from any body of medical practitioners professing to have the welfare of our honourable calling at heart.

In conclusion, had Mr. Kelson been present at the Annual Meeting and dinner party which followed, I can assure him, from personal observation, he might have seen, that diversity of opinion, so far from leading to "dissention and animosity," is perfectly compatible with that good feeling which should always characterize a liberal, benevolent, and learned profession.

Yours obediently,

ROBERT H. POWELL,
