Tametomo, a youthful warrior of ancient Japan, by his military prowess made himself master of the island of Kyushu, thus drawing upon his father the punishment of deposition from office. Filial piety, one of the chief canons of Japanese warrior ethics, induced Tametomo to surrender himself, but civil war broke out and he joined his father's party. He was vanquished, and the Emperor ordered that the sinews of his bow-arm be cut and the youthful warrior exiled. Healing waters cured his wound, and an expedition was sent to put him to death. In the scene here reproduced Tametomo has just sped an arrow with such effect that the enemy ship founders. Date, A.D. 1186-1181.
