"...of great force against sundrie diseases..."

During the Middle Ages such remedies as the 'Hiera Picra' were prescribed for every ill from leprosy to diseases of the liver. The more complex the formula, the more potent it was claimed to be. One version of the famous 'Theriaca' listed 250 ingredients, many of them 'superstitiously derived from oracles, dreams and astrological fancies.' Laboratory equipment was, of course, so crude that even the simple hand-rolled pill varied enormously in dosage.

Today we have an exact pharmacology, evolved by scientific chemical and medical research and backed by a vast supply industry. Technical equipment is keeping pace with knowledge and a modern fuel, gas, is playing its part in many essential laboratory processes . . . in automatic stills, sand baths, constant temperature baths . . . in sterilising, refrigerating and incubating cabinets . . . and in water heating, incineration and other service installations.

THE TWENTIETH-CENTURY RESEARCH WORKER KNOWS THE VALUE OF GAS

Gas equipment is still available for priority work. Wartime experience and achievement will benefit post-war planning.
