SURRENDER OF THE CITY OF PTOLEMAIS, OR ACRE, TO THE CRUSADERS

Every country of Europe had poured forth its soldiers to take part in the siege of Acre which had already lasted twenty-two months when Richard Cœur de Lion and Philippe-Auguste of France reached the Holy Land to meet the armies of Saladin. Together they carried on the siege. At length, after nearly three years, during which armies had been almost annihilated and then reconstructed with fresh recruits, the Saracens were reduced, by famine, pestilence and exhaustion to the necessity of the surrender. In the scene here reproduced from a French painting, the besieged are laying down their arms and delivering up the keys of the city to the kings surrounded by their armies. The terms agreed to were that the true cross should be given up to the allies, 1000 men and 200 knights in captivity were to be surrendered, the sum of 200,000 pieces of gold was to be paid within forty days, failing which the inhabitants of the city were to be considered at the mercy of the conquerors. The English and French armies were then instructed not to harm any who should leave the city. On entering Acre each nation represented took possession of one of the quarters. Under one pretext or another Saladin delayed, and did not carry out the terms. Richard, irritated, massacred 5000 Moslems—an act which was regretted by his whole army. Date, A.D. 1181.
